Adobe Photoshop Elements is another free program that allows some basic editing functions; it's much simpler and more limited than Photoshop. Avoiding Photoshop hassles The fine folks at Adobe don't want you to accidentally change the background of your photo when you press the Eraser tool. (They've even included a reminder of that in the Tool Palette in Figure 16-8.) If you find yourself picking up the Eraser tool and unintentionally erasing your photo, don't fret. Photoshop already offers some safeguards to protect you from making unintentional changes. The next few sections examine how to work around the safeguards so that you can modify your images as needed. Photoshop warns you before you modify your image If you accidentally click OK when you want to keep the image the way it is, Photoshop warns you right away with a little pop-up window (refer to Figure 16-8). Photoshop also warns you when it's about to apply a major modification to the photo because doing so could easily change the image in a way that it can't recognize. You also see a warning if you start the three-step process of erasing the area that you want to keep. The warning informs you that the Eraser tool is about to change the area under the icon at the lower-left corner of the warning box. So double-check your path before you start erasing; you can't change what you can't see! Don't click the Eraser tool unless you intend to delete something. Either don't use the Eraser tool at all, or use it only to confirm that you want to keep the area you want. Photoshop gives you a little warning before you apply a major modification The warning in Figure 16-8 appears only after a major modification is about to be applied. It appears only for a few seconds and disappears as soon as the modification is finished. This warning is necessary because you're about to "alter" the image in a way that you can't undo. (For more on altering images, see the "Creating and Altering Layers" section, earlier in this chapter.) Don't click OK if you don't want to apply a major modification to your image. Instead, follow the earlier section "Choosing your tool of choice." If you do click OK, the image immediately changes from one state to another, and you're not able to return to the previous state. So if you make a change that you don

It is known to provide the two ends of a cable with a wire having a larger gauge than a wire of a core or center of the cable for reasons of strength. It is often desirable to provide a cable of narrow diameter with the wire for a distance, which is considered the maximum distance that the cable is reasonably expected to be run. With such a construction, the bulkiness of the wire in the cable becomes larger than is desired. It is known to provide a series of holes around the ends of the cable to reduce the size of the wire. However, such holes or notches must be made by manual labor so the arrangement is relatively expensive to manufacture. A further disadvantage is that the holes or notches provide an area of weakness in the cable. It is also known to provide a connector terminating end of the cable having an integral extension for terminating another cable. Such a prior art connector is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 4,092,688. It is known to provide a cable termination with a sleeve adapted to fit over the cable and to have a tab from which a screw is detachably connected. It is known to provide a sleeve adapted to fit over the cable to permit a cable to be detachably connected at an end thereof. However, such a prior art sleeve has to be removed from the cable to insert another cable therein and thus removal and replacement of such a cable is somewhat cumbersome. A further disadvantage is that the cable has to be moved which increases the chance of damage. Also, the cable is not supported at both ends. Such sleeves are shown in U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,980,369 and 4,498,220. U.S. Pat. No. 4,079,574 discloses a cable termination having a sleeve at both ends but such a cable termination requires that the cable be removed to insert the sleeve thereon.

Q: I'm trying to loop through a list of files on client side to display progress bar using electron I need to display a progress bar in electron to give the user an idea of how much time he will spend to finish an upload with node.js and filemover. I chose to use the watch object to call a function to execute the upload, but the variable is not updated after the first call, so it only displays the first progress percentage. This is my code.
