The idea of "Cyber Protocol" is simple and consists on using your teleportation and time-travel technology to intercept enemy automobiles before they collide with your space car. Each level has a maximum of five vehicles and you have 30 seconds to avoid damage and see to the satisfaction of an enemy that has died. If that enemy returns on your location in time to cause damage then he will still work in the next phase of the level. There's no in-game hint or visual hint. Instead all the players will hear a pre-recorded hint when entering a new level. If you like the idea behind this type of game, then this is something that you should pick up. Cyber Protocol Gameplay: There's one key concept behind "Cyber Protocol" that is worth noting. The transition from level to level is controlled by the game and not by the player, therefore is possible that a player starting a difficult level with full time remaining, and finishes a relatively easy level in the same time. Despite this, it's never happen in the first level. This is not hard to achieve, since each level is made to be completed in about five minutes. You start out with a tour of twenty levels or so, the fastest of which only takes about one minute to complete. This is the number one reason to buy this game, since there's no cost. It also helps to lower the time that you spend without playing again, because you don't have to remember what is the best scoring and the fastest level. But, if you don't enjoy the game that much, it takes about four hours to complete the eighty levels of the game. "Cyber Protocol" hasn't the same esthetic quality as many of the other arcade games of the genre. But, it's not a very hard game, and it's a nice combination of arcade and puzzle to solve. Graphics: The graphics are OK, some are very polished. For example the cars moving on the track that change color during the level involve some graphic work, but it's good and not frustrating. Even the background could use a second pass. "Cyber Protocol" has many rooms or zones, but most of them don't have enough graphic work to attract the player's attention. For example the first zone is decorated with too much noise (noise
